Lived Experience Discharge and Transition Project

About your peer support call

For people leaving hospital and people who support them

You can choose a call from a peer support worker after you leave hospital.

A peer support worker has their own experience of mental health difficulties and recovery.

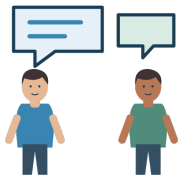

They use this experience and training to support others.

You can say no or change your mind.
Your care will stay the same.

This call does not replace your care team or appointments.

How a peer worker can help

Hope

They can help you find hope that things can get better.
Your recovery does not have to look like theirs.

More choice and control

They can help you explore your choices.
You decide what matters to you and what you want to do next.

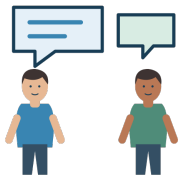

Opportunities for recovery

Recovery means building a life that feels right for you.

Together, you can look for support, activities or learning that help you do this.

What we can talk about

We can talk about how things have been since you left hospital.

You can tell us what helped and what was hard.

If you support someone, you can ask for your own call.

You can talk about your needs and what would help you.

We can look for support together.

You can ask for help to contact a service.
You can skip any question or stop.

Your choices and privacy

The caller will explain their notes and who can see them.

If they are worried about safety, they may need to get help.

We ask separately before using your feedback for the project.

You can still get support if you say no.
A later call is a separate choice.

Ask the ward if you want a call or help to understand this leaflet.

For urgent help, use your care plan.
In immediate danger, call 999.
